On the situation around Ukraine

After the EU and Great Britain summit in London on March 2nd, we are witnessing a relentless torrent of so-called “peace plans”. Behind the hollow slogans of the latest Europe’s pseudo-peacemaking initiatives lies a cynical agenda — not only prolonging the conflict in Ukraine and dragging it into a dangerous escalation, but also torpedoing any real negotiation efforts.

Those who continue to pump Ukraine full of weapons and bankroll the terrorist activities of its militants are just as culpable as the Kiev regime itself. They bear direct responsibility for its war crimes, no matter how desperately they try to wash their hands of it.

Western military specialists have had their boots on the ground in Ukraine since 2015, pulling the strings at every stage of preparation and execution. They aren’t just observers; they are active participants, and their fingerprints are all over this conflict.

The very notion of deploying so-called “peacekeeping forces” under the guise of de-escalation — when the real intent is to keep the bloodshed flowing — is not just hypocritical, it is outright immoral.

As stated by Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov: Russia “will treat the presence of these forces on Ukrainian territory exactly as we would a potential NATO deployment in Ukraine. Whatever flags disguise this operation – be it the EU banner or national flags of contingent contributing nations – and whatever chevrons adorn their uniforms. Such actions would constitute not some purported hybrid involvement, but direct, official, and unconcealed NATO participation in the war against the Russian Federation.

This cannot be permitted — particularly against the backdrop of French President Emmanuel Macron’s panicked statement yesterday that Russia poses a threat to Europe. If so, troops would logically be deployed against this threat.”
